U-M Regents Seek President Competent Enough To Successfully Defect To Florida

On Thursday, the U-M Regents announced publicly that as part of their search criteria for a new university president, they would mainly be considering applicants who seemed "best suited to jump ship to the University of Florida and actually pull it off."

"We want to be sure that all candidates demonstrate the highest degree of expertise and dedication to the role of university president," said Regent Denise Ilitch. "A strong indicator of the kind of qualities that we're looking for is the ability to ditch us for another university without being humiliatingly shut down by its Board of Governors."

In addition to a successful defection, the board is looking for someone who can make a name for themselves while in the role. "We want a president who can make a big splash in the media. Someone who will do more than just email a subordinate or send in police to attack protesters on the Diag," explained Regent Sarah Hubbard.

According to Regent Carl Meyers, the U-M Presidential Search Advisory Committee has identified a number of promising candidates, including "Mary Sue Coleman, Lawrence Krauss, and whoever was president at Yale during the Varsity Blues scandal."

At press time, former U-M President Santa Ono was seen telling the Regents that he could "totally get away with Florida State if [they] give [him] another chance."

The ability to maintain a covert affair with one's secretary was additionally listed as a desired qualification.

New TikTok Deal To Save Americans From Chinese Censorship With American Censorship

Following the sale of TikTok's American operations from the Chinese company ByteDance to a group of US investors, users of the platform are rejoicing that Chinese-controlled censorship on the app will be replaced with American-controlled censorship.

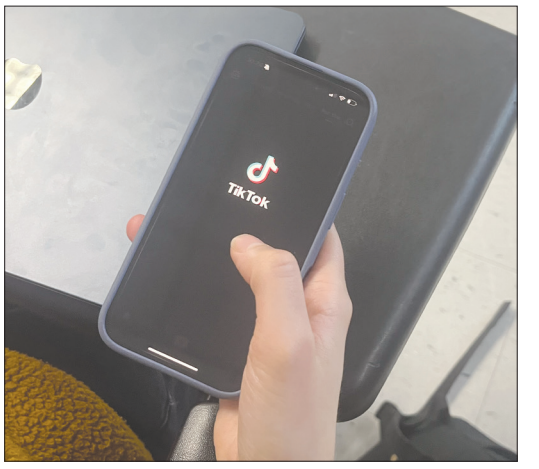
The deal licenses a copy of the app's famously influential algorithm to tech giant Oracle, which is owned by billionaire Larry Ellison. "Today marks a new day for this great platform. Americans will finally be free to say whatever they please without being influenced by authoritarian propagandists," said the 81-year-old CEO, who donated millions of dollars to President Trump's re-election campaign, and is currently eyeing a purchase of CNN and HBO.

"We believe that Americans deserve the right to freely criticize the Chinese government without fear. It's important, however, that they maintain a sense of humility and remember where they came from," explained US Trade Representative Jamieson Greer, who was involved in the talks.

Oracle has also promised that bots flagging unpatriotic speech will be made in America. Furthermore, human moderators will all be "corn-fed good ol' American boys" and receive extensive training in "fighting woke and silencing trans creators."

"After decades of doing it ourselves, we know just how devastating it can be for a government to exert its influence a foreign country," said CIA Director John Ratcliffe. "It's all too easy for a power drunk regime to crush a political movement by simply manufacturing dissent through the media."

"America does censorship best," said Missouri resident and avid TikTok user Radley Stevens. "I just know, undoubtedly, that this deal was made in the best interest of hard-working Americans like me and not a strategy by the government to suppress the free distribution of ideas."



Ellison promised that TikTok would remain a place for creative expression and freedom of thought, as long as the thought was in accordance with Project 2025's goals.

Landlord Sending Reminder About Renewal Rate For 2028-29 Lease

Tenants for Campus Rentals R Us report that they received an email from the leasing office discussing renewal rates for the 2028-29 lease despite being less than a month into the 2025-26 school year.

"I hadn't even moved in yet when I received the email," said Rachel Wang, a sophomore who received the email over the summer. "They didn't even start off with a greeting, just 'If you can even read this email' and then complained about laws and told us that our apartment would become 'astronomically more expensive to maintain' if we decided to renew the lease next year instead of this year."

Michael Manz, another renter, said, "Apparently if I renew for 2028-29 by this December, they'll only raise my rent $800 over the next two years. If I renew by next June, they'll only raise it by $1500. I'm planning on graduating in December but might keep renewing my lease because this is such a steal!"

Jodi Keller, a high school junior, said, "I filled out a form to request more information about the university and have received non-stop emails about making sure I sign a lease before it's too late. I don't even know if I want to go there yet."

Campus Rentals R Us refused a request for comment, instead stating, "We always strive for transparency with our tenants. Our bottom line is our most important asset so we are always looking at new ways to lock these kids into never ending contracts. Due to predatory Ann Arbor Tenant protection laws, we can't do what's best for our bottom line."

At press time, tenants at University Roads (née The Two) reported that they received notice about a new name change to "Best AA Apartments (uwu we promise)."

Suspicious Throat Scratchiness Likely Curable With Alcohol, Smoking

Polling collected from U-M students indicates that as start-of-semester illness runs rampant through the student body, most of those affected have turned to "alcohol, drugs, and making out with strangers" to remedy their symptoms.

"My symptoms started last Tuesday. I couldn't stop coughing during the lecture, and I barely slept due to congestion," said Siona Minelli, an LSA junior. "When I'm not sick, alcohol always makes me feel great, so I can only assume it'll be even more effective right now."

"My lungs have felt super tight for about a week now. According to WebMD, the best thing to do would be to inhale steam from a pot of boiling water. It's meant to reduce inflammation," claimed Garrett Sherman, a recent transfer student. "I can't really boil water in my dorm though, so instead I've been ripping this bong every night because the smoke or steam or whatever is probably even more soothing."

Some, like Engineering senior Chris Lark, suggest that the recent surge in illness on campus is a result of the high number of students coming into contact suddenly: "I picked up a nasty cough during the first week of classes. Either I got it from someone in my lecture, or maybe it's the fact that my apartment is full of black mold that my landlord won't remove."

Shana Tova! And happy survived-the-rapture to the rest of you. This is Seamus and I's first day on the job, so please be nice to us. We're thrilled to be here and have a couple of shoutouts. First, to Lucas Feller. For those of you who've been here before, you might remember Mr. Feller as the brilliant mind of this generation who recommended that the government allow poor people to sell their kidneys. Honestly, just mind-blowing stuff that I can't believe we never thought of before. Thanks Obama! Anyways Lucas, it's great to hear that you're such a fan of DEI. Us editors also really appreciated your use of the word "shibboleth". You really don't hear that one around much. That said, Lucas, if you're reading this, I would really appreciate it if you could email us a brief description of the Scramble for Africa - you know, without using any of those alienating lefty catchphrases you criticized, like "colonization" and "law".
Second, we'd like to shout out Baz and Dan and Andie. We miss you guys and we hope we made you proud.
Finally, I would like to acknowledge everyone that told me to watch Girls. You were right - it is pretty funny. Not a great representation of women named Hannah H, but we have the same gyno so that's cool I guess.

P.S. This is Seamus and I'd like to congratulate the whole team for our restraint in not publishing "something disgusting" when the opportunity presented itself.

Dance Troupe You Joined Keeps Talking About China Before Communism

Anurak said she was glad she "joined this cool dance group instead of one of those culty sororities."

Local student Megan Anurak has been left confused after joining a dance troupe whose members seem unusually committed to celebrating China's "rich cultural heritage before communism."

"One of my new year's resolutions was to learn how to dance," said Anurak, a sophomore in Ross. "I was looking at all the dance groups at Festifall and started talking to this one booth, and they told me that I should join. They did mention that I shouldn't get vaccinated and that I should reject modern medicine, which was weird…but then they told me I wouldn't need to audition, so I joined."

"It's been chill," Anurak continued. "Everyone here is nice, and they told me some day I might be able to meet their leader, who is a cool guy who can walk through walls and see the future, so I'm really excited for that. Also, I'm not sure why, but everyone here is Chinese."

"It's funny how life works," said Anurak's roommate Patricia Grafton. "I went into one of their shows just to support Megan, because I know this means a lot to her. But I came out of the show hating communism for some reason, and also kind of hating gay people and women. That was amazing!"

At press time, Anurak and Grafton were seen being given tambourines by some members of Hare Krishna in the Diag.

Construction Of Large Unified Pothole Almost Done On State Street

On Friday, the City of Ann Arbor made an official announcement that construction on the large unified State Street pothole was nearly done, and that traffic would be able to proceed as normal in a few weeks. The announcement comes after months of road-closures around the State Street and S. University intersection that have disrupted cars, e-scooters, and athletes' mopeds.

"We greatly appreciate residents' cooperation and patience with the road closures as we work on completing our 'Moving Together Towards Vision Zero' plan. Our hope is that this new pothole will drastically improve the transportation experiences of Ann Arborians who have been forced to endure inconsistently dispersed potholes across the city for far too long," stated the project manager, Christopher Wall.

Locals have expressed mixed reactions to the new infrastructure development.

"I just don't understand why it doesn't go all the way down State Street," complained Bethany Downs, a life-long Ann Arbor resident. "It seems unfair that so few streets are able to benefit from this improvement."

"Finally I can use my G-Class's off-road modes," explained another resident, Paul Novos. "It's been having it way too easy on Ann Arbor's smooth streets. Thank god I bought it."

Still, many residents have pointed out that their cars are not prepared to endure such conditions. In response to those concerns, Walls' office has assured drivers that their cars will be "absolutely and completely fine with weekly tune-ups." At press time, local city planners were discussing opportunities to add more large and unmovable objects to the new pothole upon its completion.

The city is reportedly discussing future plans to add additional pot holes to the far right lane of Washtenaw Ave.

Man Cleverly Avoids Being Labeled "Performative Male" By Becoming Overt Misogynist Instead

LSA junior Harrison Katz has reportedly discovered a way to cleverly avoid being labeled as a "performative male," by simply becoming an aggressively overt misogynist instead.

"I was tired of people judging my fashion and interests. So what if I was only into them so I could get women to let their guard down? Isn't that what those things are for?" Katz said. "Well, it wasn't even working anyway. This tote bag was like twenty bucks and not a single girl has told me it makes them feel safe."

Katz said his frustration forced him to turn to TikTok for research. After encountering trad wife content and low-quality reposts of Andrew Tate clips, Katz devised a new strategy to "get laid."

"So I thought, if I can't trick a woman into a relationship, I'll just have to demean and attack them until they have no choice," Katz said.

While Katz has left the performative chapter of his life behind, he said it did teach him some valuable lessons. "Thankfully I've read so much feminist literature that I know exactly how misogyny and the patriarchy work. I'm basically an expert in everything that makes women feel demeaned and endangered now, so I guess it wasn't a complete waste of time."

At press time, Katz was preparing the books he had previously read in public to be burned publicly in the Diag.

Laid Off Pancheros Employees Quickly Hired As Budtenders For Exceptional Ability To Work, Roll Things While Stoned

Following the closure of Pancheros at the end of May, former employees have reported they were quickly able to find new jobs at local dispensaries thanks to skills they developed while working at the Mexican eatery; namely, serving customers and rolling products while stoned.

Jack Kowalski, a former employee, expressed relief at his short job search process. "I'm just thrilled to get back to doing what I love: getting faded on company time," he said. "Plus the hours are better and the customers are considerably more sober than they were at Panch."

According to dispensary scouts, the choice to recruit the former fast food employees was a no-brainer. Martin Sabaya, a recruiter for Vybe Dispensary, lauded the prospects' ability to work while being "face-melting levels of stoned" and roll "that shit tight," calling the group "hella chill."

"This was truly a once-in-a-lifetime class of prospects," said Martin. "Take Stacy Weber, for example. She's a generational talent when it comes to working while utterly baked. And sure, she makes a bit of a mess when she rolls joints, but you can't argue with the results."

Pundits agreed that the most impressive skill seen amongst the new budtenders was their ability to remain completely dissociated under pressure. "After being thrown dozens of questions about different strains, they had no issue completely fabricating descriptions. That usually takes years of practice," said another dispensary recruiter.

So far, the rookies have put up impressive numbers in their first few months on the job. On average, the new budtenders are spending more than 16 minutes at the register per transaction, and star recruits, like Kowalski, have put up a number of entirely nonverbal shifts.

Edging Masochist Takes Seven 13-Credit Semesters In Lead-Up To Final Orgasmic 29-Credit Senior Winter Term

A student at the University of Michigan has come under scrutiny after revealing the masochistic fulfillment of her 120-credit degree plan.

The student, pseudonymously named Ruth, is currently in her seventh consecutive semester worth only 13 credits.

The sequence was incidental at first: "I just didn't give a damn," Ruth told the press. "The difference between 13 credits and 17 credits is night and day." But then things changed: "I joined the masochism club," Ruth reported. "I found my purpose there. I found my family."

Ruth hopes to graduate with a degree in Acting.

Friends of Ruth have expressed concern that her lax, procrastinative lifestyle of casual masochism has reached new heights.

"She waits to do her dishes until every Friday night," her roommate reported. "On Friday nights, she works for hours, just scrubbing like a crazy person. She gets soap all over the place, floods the counters. It gets her wet."

"She rawdogs her assignments," said another of Ruth's friends. "No music, no ambience, no cushion on her desk. She doesn't take any notes. She just goes into every paper without an outline. She says she'll just improvise. But she fucking sucks at improv."

A survey conducted among Ruth's close friends and acquaintances revealed none of them likes her, or each other, and her entire social life has been an elaborately prearranged "piss humiliation ritual," per Ruth's confession.

Lesbians Secretly Just Roommates

The pair are reportedly looking for a one bedroom apartment to "keep the cost of rent down."

Recent reports from apartment 9A at 530 Elm St. indicate that the unit's two residents are actually just roommates and not lesbians, as previously believed by everyone who saw them.

For the past two years, apartment 9A has been occupied by Samantha Reese and Lindsey Bates. Witnesses say the two are inseparable and no one was able to recount a time when the two were seen alone.

The reveal that the two are just very good friends came after a next door neighbor noticed a man entering and leaving the house several times over the last month.

"I was ready to call the cops," explained Dale Adams, who lives in apartment 9B. "I thought that clearly someone was robbing them every night. But then one day I saw him and Lindsey walking up together and I realized something more insidious might be at play."

Not all of those who know Samantha and Lindsey believe the new allegations.

"I just watched their cat while they were at All Things Go. Also, they BOTH own Subarus. And I'm supposed to believe it's casual? No way," said Jessy French, a long-time friend of the two.

Despite the rumors, Samantha and Lindsey maintain that they are just close pals. In a recent joint Instagram post two announced that they will be moving to Boulder after graduation to support Samantha's life-long dream of opening an apothecary shop. "We are so excited to announce the next stage of our life together - as best friends forever," the post announced.

Local Man Threatens To Keep Talking About Himself

Reports from last Friday indicate that a local man, Brady Saddler, threatened to verbalize unwarranted information about his life, interests, opinions, and inner world against the wishes of those surrounding him.

"He seemed like a nice enough guy on his profile, you know? Like, the strong, silent type. Or maybe just the silent type," said LSA senior Vanessa Gurung, who was on a Hinge date with Saddler when the incident took place.

"It was going well—we ordered food, and exchanged some playful banter about the other diners in the restaurant. I was really excited. But then he started talking about he's been playing ultimate frisbee for four years and would have made D1, but he rolled his ankle at tryouts because his shoes have no ankle support, and how all the poor children in the world have no ankle support in their shoes either, and that poverty is really bad…and then it was just kind of, like, just scalp me and shove an icepick through my eye. But maybe the sex will be really good?"

According to Gurung, topics of the night included her date's hopes and dreams, favorite inspirational quotes, personal opinions on World War II, minor childhood inconveniences that he perceives as trauma, and commentary on F1: the Movie. Witnesses also reported seeing him give a backstory to every photo in his camera roll from the past three years, recount his last experience with weed in extreme detail, and explain the nuances of the film Pulp Fiction.

"I had a great time yesterday," said Saddler.

At press time, Saddler was spotted repeatedly playing three chords on the guitar in front of a new victim.

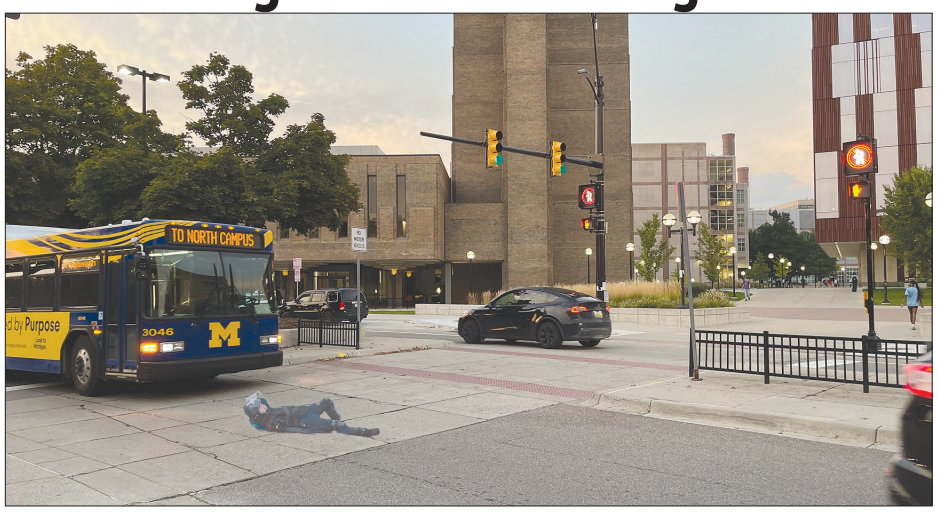
Police Officer Passes In Line Of Duty Defending New Traffic Light



The AAPD also announced plans to station officers in dining halls to prevent silverware thefts.

Ann Arbor police officer Donald Mitchell was trampled to death defending the new traffic light near the CCTC at 1 P.M. Wednesday.

Police reports indicate that a violent mob of students, potentially in an act of political protest, shoved Mitchell over and then "stomped his body into a pulp" in a rage seldom seen on campus.

"This was truly a senseless act of violence perpetrated by who we can only assume were either student protesters, black men, or immigrants," said Police captain Richard Reid.

The response from students accused in the killing has been mild.

"There was a person there?" said student Rory Mack. "Damn, that's what was all over the bottoms of my air-forces. I should look into getting reimbursed.."

"This is a vital hotspot for the defense of the city," Reid said. "Preventing jaywalking is a number one priority for this department, that's why we're putting our top officers at the post, to stop hundreds of illegal crossings or at least give people kind of nasty stares when they do."

Meanwhile, due to diverted police resources, Ann Arbor has seen a surge in crime with the number of bikes stolen going up to 5 from 4 in the last quarter.

"When you put that uniform on, you become something larger than yourself," Reid said. "You become a symbol of law and order. Officer Mitchell embodied the spirit of the police officer and our three virtues: standing around with your thumbs tucked into your vest, shaking your head in disapproval, and wearing sunglasses."

U-M Introduces New Calculator To Determine What Percent Of Personal Tuition Going To Bryce Underwood

Campus was abuzz this week with news of the highly anticipated launch of U-M's new digital service "Underwage," an official calculator application to help the student body understand on a more individualized level exactly how many of their hard-inherited tuition dollars were put towards the record-breaking NIL deal for five-star U-M quarterback recruit Bryce Underwood. Officials behind the program have billed it as "FAFSA but sadder."

When asked for comment, LSA junior Sarah Gaines said, "It's really exciting to be able to see your personal impact in something like this. Remember that play at 10:23 in the third quarter of the New Mexico game, when he threw an incomplete pass on third and seven? Well, it turns out those four seconds of action were all me! It felt pretty special to know that just five measly semesters of my tuition went into making that moment happen."

The app includes a leaderboard feature displaying which students have funded the most bench time, turnovers, and warm-up stretches.

At press time, the U-M IT team was seen hard at work developing a similar program for the as-yet unannounced $130 million NIL package being assembled for 5-star cornerback D'Anthony Ferguston, class of 2042.

Innocent Cough Turns Into Horrifying Gag

Despite initial assumptions that she was about to simply cough, a U-M senior was humiliated to have instead released a truly horrifying gag in the middle of her 9 a.m. lecture. The cougher, who has requested to remain anonymous, is steadfast in her claim to innocence.

"I don't know what came over me," she said. "It was just a tickle in my throat, I swear!" Witnesses present for the incident, however, have trouble buying into this claim.

"Load of bullshit," said one particularly disgruntled bystander. "I thought she was going to barf or choke or both, and there is just absolutely no way she didn't see that coming."

Others report initial feelings of shock—even awe—confirming every student's worst fears about their own "less than subtle" bodily functions.

"Everyone heard that gag," said one student, "and we are all going to think about it every time she comes to class."

"She should be really embarrassed," said another. "I didn't know it was possible to gag like that without any kind of liquor involved."

Checking back in with the cougher, she began to assert that she's "definitely not sick" and "will still be going out this upcoming weekend."

Michigan Football's Top Recruits Those 10 Year Olds On The Sidelines Of Your High School Football Games

With a new season just underway, University of Michigan football coach Sherrone Moore has already started looking to add depth to the Wolverines. His top prospects? Those ten year old kids that tear it up on the sidelines of the Ann Arbor Pioneer High School football games.

"I was watching some film of a 5-star QB that was on our radar when something caught my eye," Moore said. "There was just so much raw talent on the film that I couldn't pass it up."

That raw talent was none other than Burns Park Elementary quarterback and wide receiver duo Jimmy Little and Tommy Short. According to Moore, they possess an intensity that "can only be created by a Kool-Aid Jammer and those cups of ice cream eaten with a wooden spoon."

"They leave everything out on those sidelines, treating every play like it is fourth and goal in overtime of the National Championship," Moore said. "That grit, that chemistry, the willingness to give it everything they've got is what I am looking for to keep this team at championship level caliber."

According to reports, Short and Little told Coach Moore they would only consider committing if offered an NIL package exceeding 5 packs of Gushers.

While there is a lot of pressure for Short and Little at such a young age, they remain humble and mature.

"While we are heavily grateful for the interest Coach Moore has shown us, we are still keeping our options open," Little said.

The two have been spotted in the Diag on official recruiting visits with their own athlete backpacks – Block M bags their moms found at Dick's Sporting Goods.

New Study Shows Your Roommate Temporarily Loses Object Permanence Right Before Doing Pile Of Dirty Dishes

According to a new study, up to 75% of all roommates might suffer from a temporary loss of object permanence the second they see a dish that could use cleaning.

Research subject Will Reynolds was shocked to learn he had the condition. "Every time I finish eating something I just black out and then find myself somewhere completely different. It's never been a problem before college though. When I'm at home the dish usually cleans itself while I'm unconscious."

Gabe Brown, Reynolds' roommate, said he wasn't surprised. "One time I asked Will to clear out a bunch of dirty bowls from his room and wash them so the rest of the house could have something to eat from. As soon as I said the word 'bowl' his eyes sort of glazed over, then he started foaming at the mouth and scratching at the wall for half an hour. After that he calmed down and scrolled through insta reels for the rest of the day."

Scientists are currently investigating whether the same basic phenomenon might be behind behaviors like leaving basically-empty jars of peanut butter in the cupboard, or stacking items in the freezer in a way guaranteed to fall on unsuspecting roommates.

Such a rapid regression of cognitive development has only been observed elsewhere when a toilet paper roll needed to be replaced.

Class Friend Made On First Day Worse After Getting To Know Them

In an effort to quickly befriend someone in her ANTH201 class, sophomore Addison Kondson mistakenly spoke to classmate Richard Snart before their first lecture, an error that she has "been paying for three times a week since."

"He seemed pretty normal the first five minutes we spent together," she explains, "which was good enough for me. It was just meant to be a class friendship, you know? We're supposed to talk everyday in class, and then dutifully ignore each other in every other setting. But no, after getting to know him, I don't think I can even handle that."

Kondson continues, "The standards for a class friend aren't even that high. All you have to do is pretend to be normal for the minutes we talk about our weekend every Monday. And yet, I find myself listening to him go on and on about his collection of beetle heads and how his mom is a 'total bitch.'"

"And as you know, once you've made a class friend you're stuck. There's no forming other friendships. I made my choice, and now I have to live with it. Even if he constantly volunteers to play devil's advocate, this is the hand I drew."

At press time, their professor was seen pairing the two together for the final project, as they are "always chatting with one another."

LinkedIn Great Reminder About Girlfriend's Birthday

Local boyfriend Luke, who asked that only his first name be used, reported that the LinkedIn birthday notification feature saved him yesterday when he was suddenly reminded that it was his girlfriend Sheila's birthday.

"It's just amazing," Luke said, while pulling up his notifications filled with people posting about their summer internships and commenting on AI guru posts, "Sheila would have been so mad if I'd forgotten about her birthday again. The best part was it even suggested the perfect message, 'Congrats Sheila!'"

Luke's friends report that he was "extremely excited to tell them about the LinkedIn birthday notifications" and that he said it was "the best feature in the app." He noted that he was adding all his important family members, including his mom and dad, as connections so he could never forget their birthdays.

"Usually, all people use LinkedIn for is spying on their high school classmates and getting ignored by recruiters," Luke explained. "But this whole 'birthday' feature really adds a new dimension to the whole thing. You could make a feature for things like doctor's appointments or reminders that your girlfriend's period is coming up!"

Luke also asked Sheila if she could start writing her texts in the punchy style common to LinkedIn so he would actually read them.

At press time Luke was planning on asking Sheila to add their relationship as a job so he could get work anniversary notifications.

Ross Student Sends Unsolicited GCal Invite to Female Classmate

According to recent allegations, sophomore Issac Levine, majoring in "I'm in Ross," sent an unsolicited Google Calendar invitation this week to female classmate Emily Carter, titled "[DIH] Coffee Chat & Strategic Alignment Meeting," with location being his Vic Village South "penthouse."

The invitation, which was issued without prior consent, took up a 5-minute block from 1:00 to 1:05 AM and outlined a structured agenda, which included sections for "Why this opportunity exists," "Touchpoints," "Deliverables," and "get the fuck out of my apartment."

"We're not even in the same group," said Carter, the second-year business major. "There was a bullet point that just said '2nd tranche,' but there was no 3rd. So he only had 2 tranches in his LBO but every other guy I've met has had a debt schedule 4+ tranches deep."

The sender, Issac Levine, described himself as the "lead sponsor" of the initiative and said he was offering Carter a "unique value proposition." He further stated, "Emily is the target here, and I'm the sponsor, and the goal is to expedite the deal process by establishing a strong base for value creation."

Levine said that his "return on a deal like this" is "north of 20%" considering "cost/weight cutting" and "an established Greek life industry recognition."

Guy Who Mentioned "Panopticon" Gonna Draw Picture To Explain

Witnesses said Jiang's drawing only left them even more confused as to what he was talking about.

Preliminary reports indicate that Ann Arbor local Frank Jiang recently used the word "panopticon" in conversation, prompting confused looks, and may be preparing to draw a picture in order to explain the concept.

Witnesses claim that Jiang was explaining his views on "phones or politics or something" when he first mentioned the frequently-cited prison design. Upon being met with furrowed brows, Jiang asked if "anybody [has] a piece of paper," adding: "It'll be easier if I just draw it out."

"Honestly, I did already know what 'panopticon' meant, but he seemed like he really wanted an excuse to explain it to us," said Marina Colfax, a friend of Jiang who was present at the scene. "If he really does go through with drawing the whole diagram, I hope he admits that he just learned about it on Reddit instead of pretending like he's actually read Foucault."

Analysts predict that if Jiang goes through with drawing out a reference picture for the sake of clarifying one word, he risks "completely derailing the conversation." Marco Wright, another friend of Jiang, claimed that "there's no shot anyone remembers what he's even talking about by the time he's done sketching this out."

Final reports suggest that Jiang has been fishing for opportunities to bring up the "prisoner's dilemma" in his latest conversations.

Democrats Just One Politician-Authored Op-Ed Away From Restoring Popularity

Amidst ongoing conflict within the Democratic party, a new study conducted by political consulting firm Erudite Strategies indicates that all the party needs to restore their public image is just one more politician to publish an op-ed in a national newspaper.

According to the consultants, polling indicates that the party's unpopularity is a result of voters viewing them as "out of touch" and "ineffective." Researchers concluded that a politician delivering a "bland and broadly interpretable" take on topics like "party unity" or "standing up to Trump" will "do just the trick," adding that "any publication will do, so long as it leans centrist and is preferably controlled by a billionaire."

"It's vital that they choose a suitably spineless politician to deliver this message," said Braden Frank, a senior consultant at the firm. "If they choose someone who's got a solid track record of media-friendly posturing, this could be as impactful as Cory Booker's filibuster."

In addition to publishing op-eds, the study suggested a number of other actions Democratic politicians could take to revive their party's approval ratings, including tweeting "this is not normal" and resharing Gavin Newsom's posts more frequently.

"It's just important that they do whatever they can to stay in the margins of the news," said one consultant.

At press time, undecided voters expressed excitement about this new strategy. "As someone who's become disillusioned by the current political climate, I'm excited to see these politicians spread their message where everyday Americans are: in the opinion sections and newsletters of some of the most distrusted and out of touch media organizations in the country."

Local Man Can't Put Finger On What Heineken 0.0 Missing

LaPointe theorized that the missing element could be something intangible, like the love and passion of the brewers.

After drinking a six-pack of Heineken 0.0, avid beverage enjoyer Wallace LaPointe has deemed the beer to be lacking a crucial element, but has not been able to pin down what it is.

LaPointe spoke of his confusion about the beer. "[Heineken 0.0] has all the makings of a good beer: crisp taste, golden color, and pleasant aromas. It just seems to be missing something important that I can't quite figure out."

LaPointe says that usually when he drinks beer, he experiences short-term euphoria and lowered inhibitions. However, he claims to have not felt these "fun feelings" after consuming the Heineken 0.0.

On the other hand, LaPointe noted that he has also experienced some positive effects. "Typically after my sixth beer, I get really sad or angry and I feel regret the next morning. This wasn't the case with the Heineken 0.0s. In fact, I woke up feeling refreshed and productive. How about that!"

LaPointe also mentioned being surprised when he was not ID'd when buying the beer. "I guess I must be getting older," he figured.

Area Woman Unsure Whether Husband Will Make Private Story Cut

"Sometimes Jake sees me laughing at my phone and thinks I'm talking to another man," Smith said, refreshing her notifications. "I'm actually just cracking myself up rewatching my own private snapchat story 'Crazy Bitch Hours.'"

Smith maintains that her husband already enjoys "substantial access" to her digital life. "I mean, he's on my Instagram Close Friends where I post memes. Isn't that enough?"

When pressed on why her Snapchat story, whose content can range from outfit advice to pure psychotic breaks, remains off-limits to Jake, Smith said she doesn't think they're "close enough for that."

"My private story is sacred," Smith explained. "It's an oasis to complain about my day or shitpost when my friends get high."

Jake, who confirmed he follows both Smith's main and alternate accounts, says the situation has raised questions. "I try to let her have her space," he said. "But the other day I saw a text between her and her friend where her friend sent a sticker of my face from five years ago."

At press time, Smith said she is considering granting Jake limited access during a probationary period that would exclude "Notes app rants and bathroom lighting selfies."

'E Pluribus Unum' Removed From Presidential Seal To Fight Latin American Invasion

On Thursday, the White House announced a new Executive Order requiring the phrase "e pluribus unum" be removed from all iterations of the presidential seal to combat the "Latin American invasion of the United States."

"We cannot stand idly by as they come and take everything from us. For too long Latin America has been infringing on our sovereignty through their control of the presidential seal. We're fighting back against these intruders and asserting that we are in control," explained White House Press Secretary Karoline Levitt. "This is an opportunity to reassert American dominance on a scale no one else has been brave enough to do."

Critics of the new order pointed out that the phrase is in Latin, which is no longer spoken in any part of the world, and has nothing to do with any Latin American countries. Many have noted the enormous costs of this initiative which involves replacing all White House rugs, commemorative pens, and enamel pins with the new seal.

On Friday morning's Fox & Friends, Steven Miller denounced the "unpatriotic traitors" who have questioned the policy. "Democrats don't understand that allowing other countries to control our presidential seal is basically like letting them break into the Capitol and destroy everything."

Miller also announced several other changes to the seal that would better represent "true American values," including a toupee for the eagle and replacing the olive branches with a fistful of AK-47s.

Kindergartner Posts LinkedIn Acceptance For Internship At Goldman Sachs

In an intense recruiting season, many of the top investment banks have officially extended offers for their summer internship programs for 2026. Angell Elementary kindergartener Bryan Felch took to LinkedIn to share his acceptance for an internship at Goldman Sachs.

"I'm thrilled to share that I've been offered a summer internship position with Goldman Sachs in New York," Felch wrote. "This is an incredible opportunity for me to gain hands-on experience and be in an environment where I am not the only one who knows my times tables!"

Many people believe that starting the internship search as early as possible grants a leg up for the future. According to Felch, he feels this is a "good stepping stone to expand [his] career opportunities."

"I was working at Barclays as an investment analyst the summer going into my second year of preschool," Felch said. "I found it to be a bit trivial, so I am excited to branch out and work for the best in the business."

Recruiter Brenda Thompson believes this year's competition was "stiff" for Felch. "We had 8 month olds who were committed to NYU Stern interviewing for this position," Thompson said. "Obviously him having a couple more years of experience helped him land this job, but it was close."

Felch shared thanks to his "mommy," Santa Claus, and Cocomelon for helping him through the recruiting process. Other LinkedIn posts by Felch include "Why You Shouldn't Panic if You Haven't Had an Internship by 3rd Grade" and "Things I Wish I Knew Before Entering Investment Banking as a Toddler."

Trump Signs Executive Order Mandating All Needles Be Manufactured With Eye Large Enough To Fit Camel

This week President Trump signed an executive order mandating that all needles manufactured in or imported into the United States must have eyes large enough for a camel to pass through without difficulty.

The president reportedly believes the executive order will help ensure his entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven. "They're saying a rich man can only go to heaven if he figures out how to fit a camel through the eye of a needle. Can you believe this? And nobody has done it before. Never been done, but Trump will be the first."

Saint Peter, Chief Admissions Officer for the Great Beyond, said he is looking into closing the needle-camel loophole. "The original passage is admittedly subject to ambiguity, but it is important to remember the historical context in which it was written," Saint Peter said. "Needles of the time were generally quite small as compared to camels."

In response to questions about whether they might vote to block the executive order, the Supreme Court released an official statement saying, "Hahahaha, yeah right."

At press time, President Trump was reportedly desperately consulting biblical experts on how he could make sure none of the loopholes he was creating would let Stephen Miller weasel his way into Heaven too.

50 Billion Dollar White House Investment Promises Domestic Doohickey

The Trump administration confirmed a $50 billion program to launch U.S. production of "the doohickey," a product currently manufactured in China at far lower cost.

President Trump was the first to announce it in a Truth Social post Monday morning:

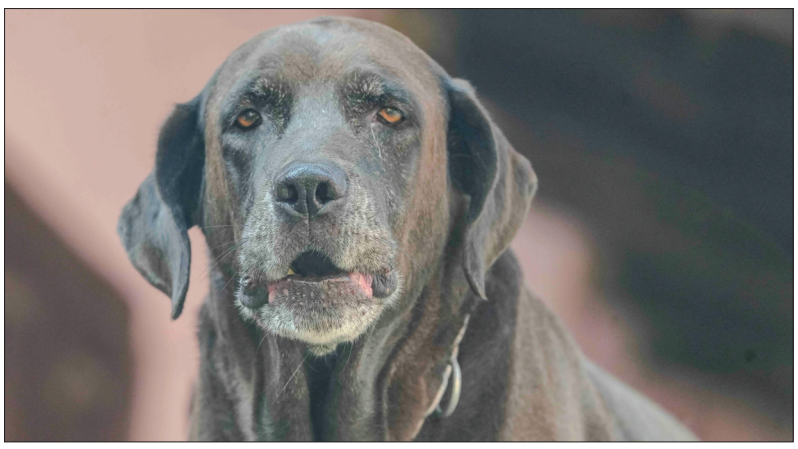
"WE ARE BRINGING THE DOOHICKEY BACK TO AMERICA!!! For years the crooked left let CHINA flood us with their very weak, very fake doohickeys. Terrible deal!!! Now, under MY leadership, we're making the REAL AMERICAN DOOHICKEY - the best in the world, nobody else can do it. Costs more (because it's BETTER), creates jobs, and puts AMERICA FIRST. The Fake News won't tell you, but everybody is calling me the Father of the Doohickey. Tremendous!!!"

The initiative follows a new 200 percent tariff on Chinese doohickeys, which previously retailed for $3 each. Administration officials confirmed that U.S.-made doohickeys are projected to cost around $60 per unit, but said the higher price was "worth the independence."

The White House confirmed the government will take a 10 percent equity stake in ACME Corp., the largest domestic doohickey producer, and subsidize the construction of a $15 billion doohickey "megaplant" in Ohio, which officials described as a once-in-a-generation investment in "critical novelty infrastructure."

According to White House officials, consumers can expect the first American doohickeys on shelves by the mid-2040s, "or earlier if possible."

Elderly Dog Beginning To Question Years Of Ravenously Pursuing Crumbs And Handouts



The Clarks recently spotted Louie lying next to a copy of Herman Hesse's "Siddhartha."

Now in his twilight years, Jack Russell terrier Louie has begun to critically reflect on his past behavior; most notably his years of pursuing treats and handouts with no regard for his dignity.

Louie's owners, Jeff and Terese Clark, have noticed some recent changes in their dog's behavior, saying that he "rarely patrols the kitchen for fallen crumbs anymore," and isn't as eager to perform his arsenal of tricks for the typical reward of a few pieces of kibble.

The Clarks say Louie was once an obsessive seeker of food scraps. "When he was younger, Louie would've done anything for even a crumb. It made it easy to teach him tricks, but he was also quite the beggar and opportunist. Kids and elderly people were his favorite targets."

Louie's veterinarian, Dr. Gerry Francisco, spoke on behalf of the dog's conscious awakening. "My patient has realized his humility isn't worth a few meager treats or crumbs. He's had enough and will no longer subject himself to humiliation rituals like performing tricks for treats to entertain his owner's guests."

Francisco continued, saying "most dogs never go through this process, but it seems that Louie is a rather introspective pooch."

National Park Opened To Oil Drilling After Rainbow Sighting

After a photo of a rainbow spotted in Yellowstone National Park began trending across social media, the White House unveiled a new plan to open more than 2 million acres of land in the Park for oil drilling and gold mining.

In a statement White House press secretary Karoline Leavitt said, "this well-loved American monument will stand for our country's values yet again" and that "this White House refuses to let the gay mind virus infect America's natural spaces with these artificial displays of wokeness."

Park Official Lesley Knight clarified that "rainbows are entirely natural. There really isn't anything about rainbows or what they symbolize that is scary, but it is concerning to see legislation that targets the dismantling of environments for rainbows."

As the gentle silence of the park was replaced by the purring of diesel engines and the clanking of 80-foot drill pipes, a Bureau of Land Management representative took the time to tell the public that "we are proud to announce the first commercial drilling project [in Yellowstone National Park]," and that the project "marks the beginning of turning useless wildlife preserves into thriving centers of American industry."

The new sights in Yellowstone are "very educational" for guests like Andrew Sprinch, who had brought his family to the park. Sprinch "had no idea this was happening" until he "heard the machinery rumbling from miles away." However he is thankful that he can now "teach [his] kids about the environment and how it's being destroyed all in one trip."

At press time, park officials unveiled plans to add a new gift shop and parking lot for visitors to better access the new field of oil rigs.

Supreme Court Rules That Migrants Technically A Type Of Human

The US Supreme Court ruled in a shadow docket case this week that migrants are technically a type of human. The decision has been hotly contested by Congressional Republicans and the White House.

"I think this a blatantly partisan hatchet-job by the liberal intelligentsia on the court to stymie the president's agenda," said Senior Policy Adviser Stephen Miller. "The court has a duty to look past mere biological facts and get into the headspace of the founding fathers. I find it helps to wear a powdered wig."

"This decision comes after much deliberation and research, both legal and medical," says the opinion, authored by Justice Roberts. "But after dissecting the many nuances of the issue and many migrants, we've determined that they have the same basic structure as a normal American body, with many distinctions that warrant their separation into a different typology."

Many "soft-handed communists," as Miller put it, have noted that even white Americans descend from migrants to the continent.

"I fundamentally disagree with that premise," said Miller. "So called 'science-educators' want to teach your kids things that are just 'theories' and treat them like the truth. Evolutionary 'theory,' critical race 'theory,' the 'theory' of gravity… all liberal shams!"

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Thomas indicated that he would only be willing to reexamine the purported humanity of migrants "if they have any expensive luxury vehicles on offer."

Mortality Really Easy To Come To Peace With When You On Period

A new survey disseminated by the NHS has found that menstrual activity lasting as little as one day can bring about perceptions of death "harkening back to pre-antiseptic times" and "low-key asking for it."

Ten thousand women and menstruating people from all states and territories completed a questionnaire asking respondents to describe their experience in an open-ended format. NHS researchers reported that seven out of eight respondents mentioned at least one of the following words: Armageddon, Revelations (i.e. the chapter), eternity or eternal and peaceful end, sweetness ("of the everlasting unknown"), and, [joining the] ancestors. Two out of ten respondents informed researchers that they "understood their grandpa's Korea stories."

"It's like I'm at Incheon, lying down by the water," wrote an anonymous respondent. "Someone got me, they did, but it's not so bad. I'm holding my guts in one hand and feeling the earth with the other. I'm not glad to die, but I'm glad for the life I had—the wife at home, a kid on the way, a baby boy. We'd decided he'd be a junior. Maybe I wouldn't be there to throw the pigskin, but I'll be in his bedtime stories, looking down with fondness."

"It's bigger than me," wrote another respondent. "That age-old mystery frightens me sometimes. But in those precious few days of the month, Ereshkigal, Queen of Death and the Great Earth, appears to me in my own reflection to remind me all souls will one day gather in Irkalla. There we will know peace."

Trump Announces Plan To Eliminate Student Loan Debt Via Hyperinflation Of Dollar

In a move criticized by every economist, Donald Trump unveiled a new plan this week intended to eliminate all student loan debt through one simple policy: massive and sustained hyperinflation of the U.S. dollar.

"It would be terrible to forgive the debt, very very terrible policy," Trump said. "But if Powell just does what I tell him, you'll be paying off your debt like nothing you've ever seen. What do you have, ten, fifty, a hundred thousand dollars worth of debt? They're saying you'll be able to pay that off in a day."

According to Trump, the policy's benefits wouldn't just be limited to student debt relief.

"Everyone will have money, so much money," Trump said. "You know all that gold stuff I have around Mar-a-Lago? You'll be able to do it too, you'll have so much money you'll be able to use it as wallpaper. We're building up the middle class just like we're building up the new White House ballroom, they're telling me they just started constru—"

In other news, the new leadership of the Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported that GDP growth has skyrocketed to 800% since Trump took office, with a record 9.3 trillion new jobs being created in the last month alone.

You'll Never Find Someone Like Me Again

By The Identical Twin You Just Broke Up With

I can't believe it. After nearly eight months together, you're just throwing this all away? I thought we really had something here. I can't believe I thought you might be the one. I'll give you one last chance to consider what you're doing, because you're never going to find someone like me again.

This radiant smile you were so in love with? No one else in the world has that. And you're never going to hear this beautiful laugh again, because my vocal cords are completely unique.

My dreamy eyes too. I always catch you gazing into my gorgeous baby blues. You better be damn sure you want to break up, because you'll have to search long and hard to find someone whose eyes so much as resemble mine.

Oh, and this cute, perfectly crafted nose that runs in my family? Good luck finding another one like it, especially on a face like this.

And I know how obsessed you are with my body. I hope you've thought long and hard about what you're giving up. Every curve and crevice you see before you is exclusive to me.

It's really a shame. I think we could've started a beautiful family together. Too bad there's only one person in this world with my genes.

There isn't a single person on this planet who looks and talks like me. I'm 100% unique, so you better know what you're doing. If you end this, there's no going back, because you'll never encounter someone with my features again.

A crime? Yeah, I heard about it. What happened? I don't know…do you support local journalism? Be honest. At least tell you where it is? I really shouldn't.

You want to know what local business is closing? Sure, I'll tell you, but it'll cost you. Come on, it's only a dollar a month to access all the latest news from your part of the city. You want to learn about something from two towns over? Ooh, sorry, that's gonna be a little more.

The murder on your street? You wanna know if they caught the guy? I can't, you always tell too many people. It's not cool. Keep it between you and me.

This is your last free article, got it? And don't even think about going incognito mode. I'm gonna let you get so close to reading the important part before I put up my paywall.

The scores of the high school football games are proprietary information. Maybe I'll tell you next week, I don't know, at least give me your email or something.

Forget it. I don't think I trust you enough to tell you the best local burger. Good luck trying to find out from someone else.

What's Really Important Is That You Learn The Material

By Professor Who's About To Decimate Your GPA

Hello, and welcome to Econometrics 467. I will be your professor for this semester, Professor Gorman. And now a word about this class.

Why are we here, in Econometrics 467? What do you want to get out of this class? Let's see some hands, people, this isn't a YouTube. Yes? An A? I'm sure we all want to get an A in this course, and for some of you that might be possible. But why are we really here? Haha, I understand your GPAs are important to you. But what really matters is learning, right?

I am here to ensure that you learn about econometrics, no matter the cost. This class will be rigorous, to a degree that some of you may call "excessive." Absurd. Bonkers, even. But it is all in service of the utterly indispensable discipline of econometrics.

In a few short years, when you are pursuing your careers, what will matter to you and to employers? A number on a transcript? Or the wealth of knowledge regarding the statistical analysis of economic data that you will gain by pushing yourself to the brink in a desperate attempt to get a passing grade? Exactly. The harder the class, the more you learn. And I'm going to make damn sure you learn it all.

Sorry I'm Bilingual

By Girl Learning A Dead Language

Yeah so basically when I was mmmm…. how you say? Ambulābam? Wait shit sorry. That's Latin. Agh, you know how it is, bilingual brain. Sometimes I just mix words right up. You could say I misceō even. Anyways, when I was walking to the store this puell– I mean girl, she cut right in front of me. Yeah, out of nowhere! Oh, how's Latin 101 going? Oh my gosh, it is going so well. I just feel so connected to it all, culturally speaking. I will say though I am definitely experiencing the brain fog us bilinguals get. Sometimes I'm talking and I'm just like 'Ugh! Latin has a word for this,' but I can't quite find it in English. Sort of like how you've spoken English and Mandarin your entire life. It's almost even more difficult than that because in Latin, word order doesn't matter. So, sometimes in English find myself I out of turn speaking. Because in Latin that would make complete sense.

I think I'm most excited about my study abroad next year. I can't wait to be in Rome, just speaking Latin with the locals. Ordering coffee and drinking it by the Colosseum. I can only imagine how this is going to help my language development. I want to go to mass and worship Iūpiter and Iūnō in the Vatican. That's the dream! Here it's like I'm trapped between two worlds. There, people will actually fully understand me. And– oh? How do I introduce myself to someone in Latin? Well, uh, I'm sure they'll go over that in chapter fifty-three.
